Une série d'études réalisées au cours des 13 dernières années sur plus de 500 participants aux États-Unis, mais aussi en Chine, en prenant en compte plus de 750 heures d'eye tracking.

Tendance à procéder au scan d'une page plutôt qu'à sa lecture linéaire. Leur objectif : trouver l'information la plus pertinente par rapport au but de leur recherche. Si ce type de page était scanné jusque-là de manière relativement linéaire, les résultats montrent que cela n'est plus le cas aujourd'hui. La cause : la diversité et la richesse des éléments qui composent une page de SERP sur le moteur de recherche Google, ou son concurrent Bing.

Selon l'analyse du groupe Nielsen Norman, les internautes scannent ce genre de page sur le modèle du flipper, en rebondissant de blocs en blocs entre les différents éléments proposés sur une SERP.
